Developing a Resilient Workforce: How Organizations Thrive in the Face of Adversity

Resilience is associated with reduced stress, increased engagement and better performance. Creating a resilient organization that can successfully “bounce back” and grow from adverse experiences has become increasingly critical given the challenges we face today. For leaders who hope to accelerate performance and capitalize on change and uncertainty, it’s moved from highly desirable to crucial. Download Your Copy

From Survive to Thrive: Tipping the Balance to Support a Resilient Workforce During the COVID-19 Crisis & Beyond

Human survival requires resilience. And yet, when faced with crises and adversity in the workplace such as the current Covid-19 crisis, the anxiety, stress and uncertainty our people experience can lead to burnout, disengagement, and mental health issues. The current mix of work-from-home, social distancing at work, economic anxiety, new job roles and the threat of job loss demand a resilience that some can’t manage on their own and so they depend on their leaders for help.
